THE ENGLISH TRADITION

The traditional custom of taking afternoon tea is thought to have been started in the 19th Century by Anna, the seventh Duchess of Bedford.

In these days lunch was served early in the day, and dinner was not served until late in the evening. Every afternoon, the Duchess found that she was rather hungry and started taking a pot of tea and some light refreshments in her room. She began inviting her friends to join her and very soon taking tea in the middle of the afternoon became the fashionable thing to do.

Tea comes from only one plant, Camellia Sinensis, and processing the teas is what determines the colour and aroma. Black teas are fully fermented, Oolong teas have interrupted semi-fermentation, while green and white teas undergo no fermentation.

Herbal and fruit infusions are, as the name indicates, made from herbs and dried fruits and do not contain any tea leaves.
